Dear Colleague:

Most educators agree that small group reading instruction is a powerful, time-efficient way to meet the diverse needs of our students. But not everyone agrees on the best ways to structure these approaches. And even when we do, many questions and challenges remain.

If you're like many educators I've worked with, you have likely asked yourself questions including:

How do I best form small groups? By levels or skills?

I want to use small groups, but how do I best implement them?

How do I make sure my small group instruction is truly differentiated?

What are the rest of my students doing while I work with a small group?

These are just a few of the topics we will explore! In addition, we'll look at practical ways that we can make our small group reading lessons more explicit, strategic, and engaging so that reading skills really stick for our grades K-2 students.

During our day together, I will share dozens of methods and routines you can implement in your classroom immediately – regardless of the reading curriculum you use. We will also explore ways to support students in a variety of reading skill areas: phonological awareness, phonics, fluency, and comprehension.

Join me for a fast-paced, strategy-packed day that promises to energize you and take your small group reading instruction to new levels.

Sincerely,

Annemarie Johnson

P.S. Your time is so valuable and taking a day out of your classroom can be challenging. I promise to make this a worthwhile day for you and to fill your toolbox with valuable resources.

"During our day together, I will share dozens of methods and routines that you will be able to implement in your classroom immediately - regardless of the reading curriculum you use."
