Practical Ideas and Strategies

Is it challenging, trying to keep your students with ADHD engaged and on task? Do interruptions, inattention, and constant repetition drain your instructional time? This seminar, presented by MELISSA DAVIS, is designed to equip busy educators with practical, research-based strategies to more effectively support students with ADHD in school settings. Melissa offers insights grounded in her many years of working with challenging and disruptive behaviors. As a highly experienced teacher, a spouse of someone with ADHD, and a mother of a child with ADHD, Melissa brings a unique, well-rounded perspective to managing attention, impulse control, emotional regulation, and organizational challenges in students. Gain easy-to-implement techniques designed to seamlessly integrate into your existing instruction. You will also receive a comprehensive ADHD digital resource handbook, filled with ready-made strategies, tools, and practical ideas you can use immediately. Join Melissa for the day and leave feeling re-energized and equipped to create a more structured and supportive learning environment – ready to engage and empower even your most challenging students who have or may have ADHD.

A Message From Seminar Leader, Melissa Davis

Uniquely Qualified Instructor

MELISSA DAVIS brings years of experience supporting grades PreK-12 students, particularly those who have or may have ADHD. As a special and general education teacher, she has worked with diverse learners, including those with emotional and behavioral challenges commonly associated with ADHD. She also brings unique experience as the spouse of someone with ADHD and parent of a child with ADHD. Driven by a passion for helping all students thrive, Melissa leverages her expertise to present practical, highly effective strategies at conferences and schools nationwide. Her approach emphasizes proactive teaching methods that empower educators to address ADHD-related behavior challenges, while equipping students with essential self-regulation and executive functioning skills. Melissa is the author of the children's book, My Boy and His ADHD: A Dog's Perspective (2026). She is also the author of Helping Students Who Have or May Have ADHD, the extensive digital resource handbook you will receive at the seminar. Join Melissa for a day full of actionable strategies you can implement immediately to better support students who have or may have ADHD.

Dear Colleague:

Would you agree with me that each day as an educator presents us with new and unique challenges? We're witnessing increased dysregulation among students, difficulties with transitions, organizational struggles, challenges with work planning and assignment completion, and frequent lesson interruptions. Additionally, our students exhibit decreased attention spans, hindering their ability to stay engaged in the learning. Consequently, we often must dedicate disproportionate time to managing individual students, taking away from the time and attention the rest of our students need.

Rather than "admiring the problem," this seminar addresses these pressing concerns by focusing on practical, easy-to-implement strategies for better supporting students who have or may have ADHD. By equipping you with these tools, my goal is to alleviate teacher burnout and facilitate a return to the instruction all your students need.

I want to provide you with a comprehensive toolkit of evidence-based, yet highly practical interventions. We'll focus on addressing the core challenges associated with ADHD, while simultaneously equipping you with valuable strategies that will empower your students both in the immediate classroom setting and in their future endeavors.

Join me for a positive and productive day where we'll look at ways to actively avoid common pitfalls, while acquiring a wealth of new resources for helping students who have or may have ADHD. I'm excited to help you develop strategies that will positively impact students' behavior and learning.

Sincerely,

Melissa Davis

P.S. You'll leave with lots of practical ideas and my extensive ADHD digital resource handbook, filled with strategies you can implement immediately.

"Rather than 'admiring the problem,' this seminar addresses these pressing concerns by focusing on practical, easy-to-implement strategies for better supporting students who have or may have ADHD."
