Dear Colleague:

It goes without saying that all teachers, parents and school staff strive to prepare their students for a productive and happy life. I am excited to share the latest research and early intervention strategies that I have found really work with our young students. Over the last several years, there has been a significant increase in the number of students with challenging behaviors and pervasive developmental disorders, including autism, Asperger's Syndrome and PDD-NOS (Pervasive Developmental Disorder-Not Otherwise Specified), identified at earlier and earlier ages. Each of these present challenges in the areas of behavior, social skills and communication, which can create neurological stress and impact learning and living. Moreover, many of these children with an autism spectrum disorder have some type of sensory processing difference.

In spite of these challenges, parents and educators can celebrate that we now have greater access to proven instructional strategies, research on optimal conditions for the brain to process information, and supports and strategies to assist our students throughout the learning process. By taking full advantage of the most recent evidence-based information and resources, we can begin to face these challenges with increased confidence resulting in increased student success.

In our day together, we will explore instructional and behavioral strategies to better meet students' vast learning needs, ideas for dealing with specific student behaviors and data collection techniques to better show underlying causes of the struggles that our students with special needs experience. Dozens of practical strategies and tips for creating quick visual tools will be presented to help you build your own successful program in support of young children with diverse needs. My goal is that you leave with new strategies, various resources and a renewed passion for working with your more challenging students.

I look forward to meeting you and sharing specific early intervention strategies and ideas that you can implement immediately in your own preschool and kindergarten classroom.

Sincerely,

Lisa Rogers

P.S. You will leave with dozens of practical ideas and an extensive resource handbook to help you implement the strategies in your classroom!

“My goal is that you leave with new strategies, various resources and a renewed passion for working with your more challenging students.”
